It is possible that dishonesty may succeed for a short time, but honesty is sure to succeed better in the long run. This may be seen considering the career of students in schools and colleges, and of men engaged in the business of life. The student who cheats in an examination may, if he escapes detection, gain a few marks more than he would otherwise have got. But what is the probable result? He learns thereby to trust to dishonest means of passing his further examinations, and neglects hard work, the only sure means of success. Guess, even if his dishonesty remains undetected, he is likely to be outstripped by his more honest rival, and in addition, he exposes himself to the risk of an ignominious conviction, which will ruin his reputation and surely wound the hearts of parents and friends.

The effects of dishonesty are much the same in the case of clerks, merchants, government servants, and others. They may suddenly make themselves rich by dishonest means. But wealth so obtained is as a rule rapidly squandered, and to regain resource is likely to be had again to new acts of dishonesty. Thus, the dishonest man lives all through his life in continual dread that his misdeeds may at any moment be revealed in the light of the day. Success at the beginning of his career only tempts him to become corrupt on a larger scale, and the end is generally disgrace and punishment.

So far we have been considering the question merely from the point of view of material success, and have seen that the dishonest man is very unlikely to succeed in life. But even if by some rare chance he should manage to escape detection to the end and die famous and wealthy, he must nevertheless all through his life suffer pain through fear of detection and consciousness of his own baseness. Had he been an honest man, he would probably have won still more wealth and honor in the eyes of the world and would have been spending the reproaches of a guilty conscience.

Honesty is the Best Policy

According to religious preachers and moralists, a man should be honest. He should be straightforward and just in his dealings with others, whatever the consequences of his conduct. He should not only resist the temptation to get rich quickly by being dishonest but be ready to face the suffering and loss that may be caused by honesty. This is the point of view of morality. The proverb, however, recommends honesty not as a moral ideal, but as a practical policy. We are called upon, to be honest, not because it is moral to be so, but because it is profitable to be so.

From one point of view, it is indeed true that honesty is the best policy. Consider, for example, a shopkeeper who, in order to get easy and quick profits, sells things at higher prices and cheats his customers in other ways. He may seem to prosper for some time, but, sooner or later, his customers are bound to see through his tricks and cease to patronize him. On the other hand, an honest shopkeeper is likely to flourish gradually and steadily, attracting more and more customers because of his reputation for honesty. It is true that several black marketers and they're like have amassed huge fortunes. But they have to spend large chunks of their illicit gains on trying to prevent the detection of their crimes. Besides, they live in constant dread of being found out. It is generally true that dishonesty creates more problems than it solves.

`Honesty is the best policy is a national proverb of the British. It reflects their practical character. The British are nothing if not practical, and this quality enabled them to found a far-flung empire. In the colonies which they ruled they tried to be as honest and trustworthy as possible; at least they succeeded in creating this image of themselves in the minds of many people. If the British as a nation are affluent and influential today, it is in no small measure due to the fact that they try to live up to their national proverb.

Honesty is The Best Policy

Honesty is a very rare quality. Therefore it is greatly valued. It teaches us to be fair and square in our dealings. An honest person is not only respected but also trusted in society. He makes big gains and carves a place in the hearts of people around him. A man may become rich overnight by dishonest means but that richness does not last long. Honesty makes man self-confident and bold. He does not feel afraid of anybody. He moves about with his head held high in the air. Honesty is a long-termed investment. On the other dishonesty is a vice. It breeds corruption. It causes a moral fall of the people. The fruit of dishonesty is bitter. Dishonest persons suffer mentally. Outwardly they may look happy but inwardly they are not at peace with themselves. They are not contented with what they have. Their sins haunt them. No doubt the number of dishonest persons is far greater than those of honest persons, honesty still remains the best policy.

Honesty is the Best Policy

Without honesty, we would be termed characterless. Honesty is one of the building blocks of good character and character is what establishes who we are and what we are going to achieve. Honesty is the cornerstone of character. If one is found wanting in honesty, he will be found lacking in character as well.

Honesty is not always the easiest way out of a situation. However, for the brave-hearted who do not seek ways -out of situations, it is the only way to deal with a situation or a crisis. Often being honest can mean coming under the wrath of others. There might be the fear of a backlash but one must keep in mind that in the end truth always prevails and honesty is the best policy. It might not be the easiest thing: being honest, but it is the only thing to be.

Sometimes when faced with dire consequences one is inclined to be dishonest because it takes courage, to be honest. While dishonesty may provide an easy exit out of a sticky situation, it is just a matter of time before the lies catch up. When that happens, you lose your credibility and people mistrust you forever. A politician who fails to deliver on the promises he has made to the people during the election campaign loses the people's faith and stands to lose the elections the next time around. It is difficult to trust someone you have lost faith in.

There are lies and then there are white lies. White lies are perceived as lies that are harmless hence people are often prone to using them. Being honest is difficult especially when you have something to lose like maybe a job, a promotion, the love and respect of a loved one. Taking the help of a white lie seems the easier way out. However, one lie leads to another, and, before long you are entangled in a web of lies that you find increasingly difficult to come out of. Honesty may be a difficult virtue to maintain but it is the only right thing to do.

However, situations don't always call for brutal honesty. If a friend has bad breath, there is no reason to embarrass her with the truth by telling her she has bad breath. Situations like this, when the truth can hurt someone's feelings call for prudence. A white lie said at this point to avoid hurting the friend's feelings would not be in the best interests of the friend. The best way to deal with this situation would be to play down the brutality of the truth. Instead of outright saying, "hey your breath smells awful" one could instead say "hey nothing a little mint won't cure".

The truth however hard to say must be adhered to always. In the long run, it is the best policy. Over a period of time, one will gain a reputation for being honest. And this will prove to be the building block of success. An honest person will be sought for his opinion. An honest man will always receive more responsibility at home and at work. One must remember always that, "To err is human and to forgive divine".

So when you have erred coming clean is the only option. You may be punished for it, you might have to bear the consequences of it, but if you are honest you will earn the forgiveness and respect of those around you. Honesty is undoubtedly the best policy.

Honesty is The Best Policy

The wise man who coined the saying that 'honesty is the best policy, was in every way a very sensible person. The use of the word 'policy' gave this saying flexibility, in that a person during the course of his life could adapt different ways if he felt that honesty was not beneficial to his interests. A policy is changeable, unlike a principle that is not. You cannot change the principle even if it causes loss. You suffer and even lay down your life for a principle. On the other hand, policy is just a matter of convenience. It is more businesslike and more inclined to think in terms of profit and loss.

Should then honesty restrict itself to just being a policy or should it be made into a principle? The answer to this question is that honesty should be made into a principle of life. In the long run, honesty proves to be the best wealth. A person possessing it acquires the strength of character and high esteem in the eyes of society.

Honesty is also necessary for real happiness. Dishonesty may bring wealth and influence but it can never make a person happy. At no point in his life will a dishonest person be able to free himself from the consequences of his actions. Hence he will never be truly happy and content. Fear of being caught and punished for his dishonest acts haunts him and he is never totally free from it.

Similarly, a public servant needs honesty. You cannot become a great leader without honesty. This virtue gives him the strength to do his duty towards the citizens of the country. As a dishonest leader, you may become rich and powerful. But there is every possibility that your actions will catch up with you and make you suffer. The cloud of dishonesty may hide the Sun of honesty for a period of time. It cannot however hide it forever. This proves the greatness of honesty from which no one can escape.

Honesty is The Best Policy

It has been truly said, "Honesty is the best policy". We should always be sincere in the work we do. It is, nevertheless, very difficult to accept honest means of livelihood. It is frequently seen that people generally take up unfair ways to become rich. On the other hand, those who pursue the path of honesty are frequently seen stressed in life to satisfy their meager needs. All these might have a bad effect on the nerves of honest people and they might take to other ways to earn by unfair ways. But, we should keep in mind that money earned by unfair means never brings joy.

A man who adopts truthful ways to earn his livelihood might spend a life of poverty but he is always contented. He is far superior to an affluent person who has collected a lot of wealth by taking up fraudulent means. Gandhi Ji always preached to us to lead a happy and contented life by being truthful. At present, our society has been trapped by fraudulent people, who in just a few years want to become rich.

Thus, we can see it is really difficult to lead an honest life among the fraudulent people all around. In spite of so many fraudulent people, honest men still thrive and lead their life with honest means of livelihood.

Honesty is the Best Policy

Trust and faith are two important virtues essential for healthy human relationships. That is so, because of our many limitations. Despite the remarkable progress, we have made so far in acquiring knowledge, much of our potential is unknown to us, and many of our shortcomings remain unconquered. We can be easily deceived, and since deceptions cannot be easily detected beforehand, they create friction in our relationships with others. Moreover, deceptions undermine our sense of security and threaten our very survival. Honesty and sincerity are the qualities necessary to safeguard ourselves against insecurity and should indeed be the foundations of our relations with others.
