

A visit to a Restaurant

My long-cherished desire was fulfilled only yesterday when I could visit a posh restaurant in New Delhi.

This restaurant is situated in Connaught Place. I was in awe reached there; neatly dressed Durban saluted us and showed us the way in by opening the door.

We were now in a big and beautiful hall. It was really an attractive place. Light arrangement was beautiful. Beautiful paintings were nicely set on the wall. On one wall was the picture of a fashionable girl. I did not quite relish its sight, because I do not like modernism beyond a certain limit. A blue velvet carpet laid spread on the floor.

There were about twenty tables in the hall. There were four chairs to every table. A menu book lay on each table. In one corner of the hall was the cash counter where a man and a woman were seated on their seats.

There was a raised platform. Music instruments were arranged on it. There was a chair behind every instrument. There was a chair behind every instrument. There was a microphone just below the platform. I was looking On all sides, when a waiter dressed neatly drew my attention. He came to our table, saluted us and asked for orders. My uncle made the orders.

All the lights went off all of a sudden. Only a dim light remained glimmering nothing could be seen clearly for some time. In a short while we saw the musicians having taken their seats. Music started. The waiter also came with several dishes. The dishes were very well prepared.

AS we were taking our meals, music continued to flow sweetly. All of a sudden there was a halt to music and we wondered what the matter was. My uncle told me that we would witness cabaret.

Like a flash of lightning, a charming girl appeared on the stage. She looked smilingly all around. The people returned the compliment by clapping their hands. The girl was wearing bright tight clothes which shone like the stars at night. The makeup of the girl was very attractive. She made excellent poses of dancing. She gave some hit songs also. There was attention and praise everywhere for the girl.

It was 10:34 p.m. We paid the bill and came out of the restaurant.
