There are many well-known names in the world of literature. The poems of William Wordsworth have impressed me the most. His poems soothe the sense. He was a devotee of nature. He was inspired by nature to write poetry. Recording Wordsworth is like sitting amidst nature.

William Wordsworth was the pioneer of the English Romantic Movement. He launched the English Romantic Revolution with the help of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. He was the poet laureate of England from 1843 to 1850. His poems depict man's relation with nature. He also placed poetry at the center of human experience. Wordsworth created some of the greatest English poets of his century.

Wordsworth was born on April 7, 1770, in the Lake District of northern England. He was the second of five children of a prosperous estate manager. Both his parents died at an early age and so Wordsworth was sent off by his guardian to a grammar school at Hawkshead. There he received education in classics, literature, and mathematics. The beautiful landscape at Hawkshead gave him confidence and pleasure and it inspired him. He grew amidst nature playing and indulging in boyhood pleasure outdoors.

Wordsworth was an interpreter of nature in her many moods. The natural scenery of English lakes could terrify as well as please, which Wordsworth has later testified in his line, "I grew up fostered alike by beauty and by fear." But its generally benign aspect gave the growing boy the confidence he articulated in one of his important poems "Tintern Abbey" that Nature never did betray the heart that loved her.

Wordsworth moved on in 1787 to St. John College, Cambridge. After attaining his degree from Cambridge, he went to France but he had to return to England in 1792.

For the first three or four years after his return to England Wordsworth had virtually no work. The aftermath of the war moved Wordsworth with sympathy for the sufferers. At this time he started writing poetry. He also reunited with his sister Dorothy whom he loved dearly. Wordsworth also became friends with Samuel Taylor Coleridge a fellow poet. They formed a partnership in writing. It is this partnership that altered the course of English poetry.

The Prelude is among Wordsworth's finest poems. It reflects the growth of a poet's mind. It is an autobiographical poem. It describes the way in which the imagination overpowers the reason and the senses. Wordsworth's other works include The Excursion Ecclesiastical Sketches, Home at Grasmere The Borderers, Salisbury Plain, The River Duddon, etc. In his later years, Wordsworth revised the edition of his earlier poems.

Wordsworth wrote in Tintern Abbey that Nature never did betray the heart that loved her. He formulated in his poems, a new attitude towards nature. He introduced nature imagery into his poems. Wordsworth nature. He introduced nature imagery into his poems. Wordsworth was a worshipper of nature which is evident in his poems.

According to Wordsworth poetry is the first and last of all knowledge it is as immortal as the heart of man. Critics place Wordsworth next to John Milton and William Shakespeare among all-time great poets of English Literature. His contribution to English Literature is immense.
